same team for the two-year period

Since we have 60 teams, but the Team-Based Learning Room only provide space for 15 teams, our office repeats each session 4 times - hence the once a month meetings.

At the beginning of the semester, I was unsure of the goal of TeamUp and how it would benefit me as a future physician assistant. I got more comfortable with my group throughout the semester and slowly began to understand the goal. The goal of this class was to interact with other healthcare professionals and understand their role in healthcare. In my opinion, interacting with these other professionals allowed me to understand their roles. In the future, I will know precisely to whom I would refer a patient.

Before, I did not understand a speech pathologist's and occupational therapist's roles in healthcare. After these interactions, I now have a better understanding, contributing to my interprofessional growth. I understand their training and the workload they endure to receive their title, contributing to trust within an interprofessional team. Also, understanding these roles can allow me to be a better healthcare provider. If a patient presents with aphasia, my role consists of finding out why they have this aphasia, but I have learned that I should look at the whole patient rather than just their pathologies. I now know to call on the help of a speech pathologist, and they know exactly how to communicate with patients that may have aphasia.

Over the past semester, me and my group in team 31 have had to deal with various assignments and projects which all required everyone's participation in order for the group's goals to be met. A good example of this is our health partner project. Sitting down and having a discussion with our health partner about their medical background and finding common ground with other professions have helped improved professional growth.

I believe that I will carry my experiences from TeamUp into my professional career as a clinical laboratory scientist. CLS is an under-represented profession and I believe that it is important for patients, as well as other healthcare professionals to receive a good representation of laboratory personnel. In the case of a CLS professional, it is dire to properly address health outcomes through an interprofessional collaborative approach because you are essentially the first person to receive the information that is pivotal to your patient's well-being. It is important have a combination of multidisciplinary, interdisciplinary, and interprofessional in communication when contacting Medical/Nursing personnel about the status of your patient. This is because the fate of your patient's lively hood relies on the information that must be passed over to the appropriate Medical professional, so that they proper care and treatment can begin.
