Relationship & Rapport Building in Play Therapy: The Role of the Play Therapist's Skills and Methods

Krystal Vaughn, Ph.D., LPC-S, Registered Play Therapist Supervisor

The development of the relationship and measures to build rapport in counseling relationships is significant to the ongoing therapeutic process and progress in play therapy. Therapists align with children who seek services in a state of incongruence and are vulnerable. Facilitating a relationship offers children and adolescents an opportunity to engage in the use of the play therapy principles, goals, objectives, and tenets needed to progress.

Objectives

1. Participants will discuss the tenets of building a relationship and developing rapport in play therapy.
2. Participants will identify key aspects of relationship building in play therapy.
3. Participants will review measures to assess for the development of the relationship and building of rapport in play therapy.
